the action of the leader of the Opposition in depriving his motion of any part purpose, this procedure at the same time destroyed its interest to the House, and gave rise to a feeling of dreary dullness to the whole discussion.

Those who had looked to the raising of this question with interest from the opportunity it gave to the Ministry to put forward its explanation and its defence would have been disappointed to find that in the form which the General assumed. Perhaps the Attorney-General succeeded so little in impressing Parliament as in the attempt at a defence upon which he was content to rest his case. He did not even attempt to controvert these, our readers may be sure for themselves, and form their own opinion on the matter. It was only with any respect to it that the assertion which runs through it that the Act throughout intended the destruction of the House of Lords, and immediately the new were proclaimed, and the country be thus left for three months without an electoral system, and in the first place quite gratuitously, and in the second place, out of accord with the declared intention of the House. Surely in dealing with so important a matter as the destruction of the existing electoral system of the country three months before the new can come into operation, it would be a loss of time and of energy to require. In an important matter a well-known canon of legal interpretation might well be held to apply, and in the absence of an express provision for its immediate abolition the system might be kept in force until the new was ready to take its place.

If the Act intended to provide for the immediate destruction of the old electorate assuredly it would have said so. What it did say was something to the effect that the House of Lords, the Government, on the completion of the new distribution, to issue a proclamation to "fix a date on which the unreppeled sections" of the old law should be repealed. Not to repeal them immediately, but to repeal them at a date to be fixed, words which obviously imply a date different from and subsequent to that of the proclamation itself. All this is so obvious that those who are here willing to hope that the Government was prepared to give an adequate justification of its action could hardly prevent gave misgivings from crossing their mind when so extraordinary a procedure was defended by such exorbitantly weak arguments and assertions.

When the time of Parliament is being dealt with in a way that appears to suggest that it is being wasted, those familiar with Parliamentary devices are accustomed to glance at the time in notice-parliament, and to wonder if any member on which some might desire to block. On the business which was interested and delayed by this way in which the time of the House was occupied on two successive evenings was that of the Government, and it is not to be considered to have had members in prominent positions on both sides of the House. Federation is an excessive, awkward subject, might be excused for finding an explanation of the complacency with which it was treated. It is not to be wondered in inanimate and drowsy debate in the fact that at any rate the discussion seemed to retard a subject highly interesting to many members. Misgivings of this kind are the more natural when the subject of the House of Lords, the subject of federation has been put in New South Wales politics. It was at least satisfactory to see that, late as was the hour at which the House was left free to approach the subject, Mr. Barton was not deterred from making the proposal to go into committee upon the Commonwealth Bill before the House. There was, we presume, some significance in Mr. Barton's suggestion that though he hoped the matter would be discussed in the House of Representatives, it might yet be necessary to organise arrangements to carry it on to its goal. This remark seemed to have further points given to it by Mr. Barton's renewed affirmation that he planned federation before the House of Representatives. The time may not be distant when the other members of Parliament who place federation in a similar position will be drawn by a common purpose into combination for a common action to give their purpose effect. It is not to be wondered to expect that federation will be secured by the adoption of the means ordinarily taken to give legislative and political effect to any important public policy. This question of federation, however, is a question which is not to be wondered at to be the result of the preceding debate was to cast a shadow over the beginning of that upon federation. The House could hardly be expected devoted to interest itself in a subject which it had not after so recent an illustration to how little purpose serves the more elaborately devised machinery unless this is faithfully worked in the spirit and towards the object to which it was designed to give effect.

The Intercolonial Military Tournament can be regarded from different standpoints, but hardly without interest and sympathy. The participation of picked men from the Victorian and Queensland land forces gives to it a wider character than would otherwise be the case. The tendency of the Tournament, Roschill, and Melbourne tournaments during the last few years has been uniformly in an intercolonial direction, and just as the presence of New South Wales and Victorian Australian and Indian, and Victoria (along this year lent to that gathering much picturesque, attracted public attention, and stimulated competitors, the fact that the three great colonies represented in the tournament, the Queensland contingent failed to represent failed to influence the success of the affair. That the several branches of the Australian defence forces should be brought into friendly competition, and have opportunities of seeing each other, and of taking part in contests of a similar nature of the various conditions in Australia, and of the possibility that in case of need the land forces of the four eastern colonies would be called upon to assist each other, is a fact which South Australia has submitted a scheme for a conjoint encampment of picked corps from the chief colonies, but, whatever there may be to say in favour of the idea in itself, it does not seem that the plan is likely to be carried out. It is to be hoped, however, after all, such an intercolonial encampment, if confined as proposed to about 200 officers and men from each colony, would tend to be neither less nor more than a tournament on a larger scale. It is to be hoped that the intercolonial representative take part to the advantage both the home and the visiting troops. To many of those who may attend (the
